Does Russia have military bases in Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan?

Russia has military bases in Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan. Furthermore, Russia and these countries have military cooperation through the Collective Security Treaty Organization (CSTO), which was founded in 2002. Russia has a desire, at least publicly, to not have the militaries of other states present in the region.

Why does Kyrgyzstan not have an air base?

Because of expense and military doctrine, Kyrgyzstan has not developed its air capability; a large number of the MiG-21 interceptors that it borrowed from Russia were returned in 1993, although a number of former Soviet air bases remain available.

How many troops are in Kyrgyzstan?

In 1996 the Kyrgyzstani ground forces included 7,000 troops, which comprise one motorized rifle division with armor and artillery capability. Sapper and signals regiments are attached, as is a mountain infantry brigade. Headquarters is at Bishkek.

Does Kyrgyzstan have an army?

In the early days of independence, Kyrgyzstani authorities spoke of doing without an army entirely. That idea since has been replaced by plans to create a standing conscripted army of about 5,000 troops, with reserves of two to three times that number. Kyrgyzstan has signed accords with both Uzbekistan and Kazakhstan for joint air defense.
